Part VII – Research Activities

VII.A Research topics

Keywords	Brief Description
Gender studies: gender equality, women’s empowerment, violence against women, sexual harassment at work, central capabilities	Gender inequalities are at the core of my research interests. The selected monograph [1] on regressions in gender equality and women’s human rights consolidates a long-standing research trajectory on empowerment, intersectionality, violence against women, and social justice. Over the past years, I have tried to develop an extensive body of research on gender-based violence, women’s rights, and the structural conditions that reproduce inequalities. In the analyses I have adopted an intersectional and capability-oriented perspective [14], combining theoretical depth with a sustained engagement in policy-relevant debates [8]. This line of research is reinforced by long-standing collaborations with observatories, institutional actors and international networks addressing violence against women and vulnerable groups. The long-lasting experience of scientific coordination of the Observatory of the Rome District on “Women Victims of Violence and

Their Children” (Solidea Institution) has widely contributed to go in-depth in the analysis of different forms of violence: domestic violence, intimate partner violence, cyber-violence, and harassment at work. With reference to these forms of violence, I have directed my attention not only towards policies for the prevention of violence, but also towards statistical techniques that may support the early identification of situations of intimate partner violence (IPV) [13].

Methodological innovation: Big Data, text mining, network analysis, mixed methods

From a methodological perspective, the studies of the last 15 years are characterised by the systematic integration of Big Data approaches [13], textual analysis [3, 6] and computational social science [7]. Drawing on techniques such as text mining, natural language processing (NLP) and machine learning, I have analysed digital traces and large-scale corpora to investigate public and institutional discourses, as well as to assess the social impact of critical events and policy measures. This line of research, reflected in several peer-reviewed publications, demonstrates the effort to combine advanced computational methods with substantive sociological questions—including gender-based violence, sustainability and green education, intercultural competences, and post-pandemic value shifts. The resulting methodological profile is therefore marked by a dual commitment: innovating sociological inquiry through data-intensive techniques, and ensuring that such innovations remain anchored to theoretically informed and socially relevant research agendas. In order to strengthen the integration between research and teaching, since 2015 I have established a second-level Master in “Big Data. Statistical Methods for the Knowledge Society”, developed in collaboration with more than twenty colleagues. This advanced programme was designed to bridge theoretical innovation and professional training, equipping students with cutting-edge competences in data science, computational social research and statistical modelling. It has also provided a valuable platform for embedding research outputs into teaching activities, fostering interdisciplinary collaboration, and consolidating a community of practice around the use of Big Data in the social sciences.

Ageing, intergenerational relations, housing for vulnerable populations

This line of research represents a constant core of interest within my scientific production across the years. Along this trajectory, I have tried to explore the multiple intersections between ageing, intergenerational relations and housing vulnerabilities. Early work on intergenerational cohabitation and senior–youth co-housing [11] highlighted the social and organisational conditions that enable innovative forms of shared living. This was followed by empirical analyses of housing vulnerability and frailty among older adults, focusing on the continuum between home-based care and residential services [5]. More recent contributions examine age management and the coexistence of five generations in the workplace [4], connecting demographic ageing with organisational innovation. An additional strand of my research concerns the transformative role of digital innovation within welfare services, with particular attention to its uneven effects on accessibility, equity and care relationships. In this regard, my 2020 article [2] analysed the “lights and shadows” of Italy’s digital transition in personal social services, showing how technological solutions can both enhance service capacity and generate new forms of exclusion for vulnerable groups, including older adults. Through comparative case

	studies, demographic analyses and organisational inquiry, I have studied intergenerational co-housing solutions, the housing needs of frail older people at the boundary between home and residential care, and age management practices within contemporary workplaces. This research direction has enabled me to identify innovative service models, emergent social practices and policy levers capable of responding to the challenges posed by population ageing and by the reconfiguration of intergenerational solidarities.
Interculturality, education, multicultural competence	The studies on interculturality and education constitute a further significant strand of my scholarly trajectory, bringing together sociological theory, educational practice and methodological innovation. This line of research investigates how intercultural competences are formed, enacted and negotiated within diverse educational and community settings. In the article [6] on intercultural competences in religious formation communities, the linguistic and cultural dynamics that shape learning environments in multicultural contexts have been analysed, using text-based focus group analysis to identify key conceptual dimensions. In the same year, her contribution to the Routledge volume on post-pandemic transformations [7] explores how lockdown experiences reshaped individual and collective values, highlighting emerging forms of civic responsibility and ethical engagement. The involvement in the international Summer school in Tanzania [9] further reflects the commitment to global learning and international cooperation. In that context, I have tried to combine methodological training on gender-based violence with an intercultural educational framework, fostering dialogue across academic, cultural and professional communities. Across these contributions, I have always looked at how to intersect educational processes, intercultural dialogue and global social issues.
Methodology, history of social services, sociological epistemology	Throughout my scholarly work, I have also sought to reconstruct the historical development of academic journals and social service infrastructures in Italy, to shed light on the evolution of institutional memory, professional identities and disciplinary orientations across several decades [12]. The analysis carried out highlights how knowledge is produced, archived and transmitted within welfare systems, emphasising the crucial role of documentation practices, methodological rigour and the construction of robust social observatories. This strand of research plays a crucial role in my commitment to strengthening the conceptual bases of social policy analysis, combining archival research, sociological theory and methodological reflection to interrogate how social services develop, how they represent themselves and how their epistemic trajectories shape contemporary welfare debates.
